ABSTRACT

Udoh Mahfudoh. 201230095. 2024. An Analysis of Inflectional Morpheme in British Broadcasting Corporation News (A Study of Content Analysis).

This study was about An Analysis of Inflectional Morpheme in British Broadcasting Corporation News. The data was collected from three article in British Broadcasting Corporation News that was February 2024 editions. This study has two aims, they are; to know the type of inflectional morpheme used in British Broadcasting Corporation News and to describe and explain the inflectional morpheme used in British Broadcasting Corporation News. In this research the researcher used qualitative content analysis for their study. According to Weber in Hsiu Fang, qualitative content analysis is more than just word counting it involves a close examination of language in order to efficiently classify enormous volumes of text into a number of categories. Analyzing content can be applied to both written and visual content. Experts claim that one common technique for evaluating written content is qualitative content analysis. The researcher found 8 kinds of inflectional morpheme which is used in British Broadcasting Corporation News. Base on the result, there are 132 inflectional affixes in found. Specifically, the using of suffix -ed (past tense) are 46 times, the using of suffix -ing (progressive) are 21 times, the using of suffix -en (past participle) are 2 times, the using of suffix -s (third person singular) are 10 times, the using of suffix -'s (possessive) are 20 times, the using of suffix -s (plural) are 29 times, the using of suffix -er (comparative) are 2 times and the using of suffix -est (superlative) are 3. This study highlights the significant role of inflectional morphemes in BBC News articles, emphasizing their grammatical functions and frequencies. With 132 identified instances, the prevalent use of suffixes like -ed, -s, and -ing underscores the clarity and precision in reporting past events and ongoing actions, enhancing effective communication of various grammatical relationships within the news context.
